

'ROGUES' GALLERY' WILL STOP 'CLASS SKIPPING'

Special to The Washington Herald.
Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 1.—The Towne Scientific School of the University of Pennsylvania has established what, in the parlance of the criminal world, is a "rogues' gallery." It is to consist of photographs of all its students taken at the time of their admission to the school. After matriculation and before beginning his studies every student must pose for three photographs. One goes with his registration card to the dean of the school, another to his faculty adviser and the third is filed in the permanent records of the school.

It has been a simple matter for a man of another class or an outsider to attend lectures in place of the regular student. The new "mug" will put a stop to this, as all other "substitutions," and the students think this is why the "rogues' gallery" has been instituted.

GERMANY BEATEN, SAYS SWISS EXPERT

Capt. Feyler Declares No More Teutonic Offensives Are Possible.

By JOHN L. BALDERSTON.
(Copyright, 1916.)

There will be no more German offensives, for all the Teutonic reserves have been exhausted, in the opinion of Col. Feyler, the Swiss strategist, whose publications and sources of information during the war have ranked him, soldiers of many nations declare, the leading military expert in Europe. Col. Feyler recently visited London, and there explained why he considers Germany beaten. The belief that Germany has lost the initiative for the rest of the war is widespread, but no such detailed analysis of the German armies as that made by Col. Feyler has yet appeared.

"Coming immediately after the Russian offensive in the east," Col. Feyler said, "the British push in the west has entirely altered the plan of campaign that the German army has followed from the beginning of the war. This plan is one which, in military terminology, is called an operation on an interior line. The Austro-German army occupied a central position between two enemies. It set itself, therefore, to hold the one opponent with a minimum of troops while it attacked the other, which was regarded as more immediately dangerous. The latter destroyed, it would bring back the bulk of its forces against the former to smash it in turn.

"This plan of campaign, which occupied the years 1914 and 1915, has been rendered impracticable by the new turn of events.

Seven German Armies.

"At the beginning of hostilities, the German army of the west, which should have struck the decisive blow by reason of its picked formations, comprised seven armies, a total of thirty-four and one-half army corps, plus some formations of Ersatz and Landwehr troops in Alsace and Lorraine. The full total was about 1,500 battalions. Opposed to the Russians, the three active corps in East Prussia, some reserve corps and some formations of Ersatz and Landwehr furnished a defensive combination of 340 battalions. The grand total at the start was 1,800 battalions of 1,000 men each.

"At the end of August, 1914, the first transport began. The Russians were in the much sooner than had been expected, and advanced in East Prussia. In France, on the contrary, the French retreated rapidly, and the Nineteenth Army Corps, withdrawn from Belgium, was sent to reinforce the first line in Eastern Prussia. After the battle of the Marne, the eastern lines stretched east and west, reaching the sea. In the east, Hindenburg made a counter offensive. Units designed for both fronts were called up from the interior reserve for the Russian front, sixty battalions; for the Poles offensive, 170 battalions. This made 1,220 in the west and 400 in the east—a total of 1,620.

Troops Hurried to East.

"Winter having arrived, the German general staff prepared the big offensive in Poland and Galicia. Troops were hurried from the west to the east, and new reserves from the interior supplemented them. At the end of the spring of 1915 and in the course of the summer, the effectives on the western front were diminished for some days to less than 1,120 battalions, while those on the Russian front were more than 750. Taking into account the troops guarding the German and Italian frontiers, the total was then 1,900 battalions.

"At this time—the summer of 1915—the German army came near to annihilation at its cadres. At the moment of the Balkan offensive in the fall, the German army was augmented by twenty-five battalions at the front; the process could not be carried much farther. The effect of the Champagne battle in September was a sudden rise in the number of battalions in the west; there were 1,130 at the end of August, and 1,174 at the end of September, while on the Russian front, where the defensive was for the time adopted, they decreased from 722 to 569.

Concentration in Balkans.

"This drop corresponded with the concentration on the Balkan front, which received ninety-nine battalions, and with the successive re-enforcements of the western army. The German army, according to deductions from the army in Serbia at the end of December, from sixty to seventy battalions only were left in the Balkans, while the effectives in the west rose steadily from 1,221 on November 1, 1915, to 1,396 at the end of January, 1916. Soon after the battle of Verdun commenced, and its preparations had an influence on the Balkan and eastern fronts. The proof is found in the successive increase of force in France and Belgium. By May 22, there were 1,470 battalions of all categories—first line, reserve, Ersatz, Landwehr and Landsturm—Germany Superior at Start.

"Note from these figures that from the Flanders battles in 1914 to those of Verdun, notwithstanding a defensive scarcely interrupted by some local thrusts, the German army of the west has continuously absorbed two-thirds of the total force of the empire. We are justified, therefore, it seems to me, in concluding that despite the strength of the front in deep and echeloned trenches, the power of the artillery and the effectiveness of the machine guns, the menace on the western front has seemed so great to the Germans that at no moment have they felt justified in detaching more than one-third of their troops to the eastern theater in which, with the Austrians, they sought a decisive result all through last year.

"A second important point touches on the German organization at the outset of the war. This organization purposed a numerical superiority, relative and temporary, over the French, so that a decisive result could be obtained before the intervention of a strong British army established the absolute superiority of the allies. So the German imperial staff put into action, during its offensive of 1914, three-fourths of its effectives in the west. Despite this proportion, the desired result was not attained.

"The maneuver on the interior line is now used up. Perfect as it is the network of the German railway system, it is not equal to the simultaneous offensives on the Somme and in Poland. The war has entered on quite a new phase, which has recast the conditions under which it started. Attacked with equal violence on all fronts, the Germans have to be on the defensive everywhere, and having used up their effectives in the fighting that is past, they no longer have the reserves that in 1914 they sent sometimes to the east and sometimes to the west. Now they must submit to the initiative of their enemy."

SAYS KING OF GREEKS SAFEGUARDS KINGDOM

Constantine, King of the Greeks, is not pro-German; he is pro-Greek, according to A. Vouros, charge d'affaires of the Greek Legation, discussing the probability of his nation entering the war.
"If Greece enters the war," he said, "it will be to protect her own interests. Sentiment in Greece is overwhelmingly in favor of the allies. If the Bulgarians continue to occupy Greek cities, Greece will be forced into the conflict, and if any other country dangerous to Greece is promised territory we will be forced in. It is not our war," he concluded.
